WHERE CAVIARE COMES FROM.

The Sturgeon of Southeastern Russia Supplies the Best.

From Wide Awake Magazine.

Caviare—that is, so-called caviare—comes from several countries and from many varieties of fish. But real caviare comes only from Russia, from the great sturgeon of its southeastern district.

The mere word caviare has come to be a synonym with us for the extreme of luxury. It is rather a surprise, therefore, to discover that it is pretty nearly the staff of life among the Cossack tribes, who make the catching of sturgeon their winter occupation.

The most generally eaten caviare is made from the roe of the great sturgeon, which will run up to twenty-five feet in length. The sturgeon, a smaller kind, which reaches a length of five feet, has naturally a smaller supply of roe.

It is highly prized, however, because it is from this fish that liquid caviare is made, a delicacy that is never met with far out of Russia, since it is very lightly salted and will not keep. A little finds its way to Persia and the table of the khedive, but even in Russia it is rarely to be seen, except at the czar's table or in court circles.

To make caviare you must first catch your sturgeon, and though this may be done in summer caviare making is a winter industry, and the principal part of the country through which the sturgeon yielding rivers flows consists of large plains, covered for many months deep in snow. The sturgeon, live thousands of Russians who subsist almost entirely on the fish they catch.

The traveler will find a wide variety of sturgeon, dotted with fish, but they are fishing in a way that is distinctly novel to most travelers, for their lines are passed through the holes in the ice on which they stand.

When there is a catch—and the sturgeon are very plentiful—the capture is dragged with a hook and line, and the fish is carried to a shed, where the fish are kept until they are ready to be packed for sale to caviare makers.

Liquid caviare is prepared with finest salt, in the proportion of from 4 to 5 per cent, and fetches a very high price. This kind is known as ikra.

The pressed variety is made with brine, the roe being rubbed with a wooden spoon through sieves, so as to secure the removal of all ligaments from the fish eggs. The liquid of all ligaments from the fish eggs. The liquid of all ligaments from the fish eggs. The liquid of all ligaments from the fish eggs.

This kind is then packed in oaken barrels lined with cloth, and it is known as caviare. It is known in the trade as caviare. It is known in the trade as caviare. It is known in the trade as caviare.

These Russian fisheries produce annually more than 8,000,000 pounds of caviare. Only 1,000,000 pounds of this is in liquid form. The nutritive quality of caviare is not generally appreciated. It is rich in nitrogen and fat, besides including sea salt and mineral components.

It has a stimulating and energizing effect on the stomach, Russians value it greatly, and it is said never to be absent from the czar's table. That which is supplied to the imperial family is the enforced tribute of the Cossack, who before they may reap the profit of their own industry must supply the Little Father with eleven tons of the best. To provide this amount of caviare 5,000 sturgeon must be caught.

A certain amount of caviare comes to England, France and Germany, but it is much. A good deal of that which we eat is "made in Germany" from the common sturgeon, and sent off from Hamburg as "real Russian." Another kind of caviare is made from the roe of pike and carp. It is colored red, and is known as "the Jews' caviare."

Italy also makes a caviare of her own, which is very palatable, being more delicate than the Russian. For this the bream, the pike, the perch and countless other fish contribute their eggs. Norway, too, makes a tribute to caviare, which has only a local interest.

America, anxious to be self-supporting, is making caviare also, but for many reasons Russian caviare commands the market. Formerly the sturgeon fishers added to their profit by the sale of the air bladder of the sturgeon for making singlans, and Russia was for a long time the only country supplying this commodity. Modern necessities, however, have caused this trade to be abandoned, being appropriated from other fish than the sturgeon, so the trade has declined.

Dog Carries Idaho Mail.

From the Walla Walla Statesman.

Lucifer, the big St. Bernard dog employed in carrying mail to Hailey, Idaho, to Corral, an inland town, is six years old, and it seems likely that he will have a steady job in coming winters drawing his sled over the snow on the twenty-eight-mile round trip he is making daily between the points mentioned.

Mr. Floyd's contract provides penalty in case mails are not delivered on time each day. Lucifer has saved many dollars by adding his mail to the service, and the mail in a sled fitted up with suitable harness. The faithful St. Bernard has no difficulty in drawing the sled, and often has more than 100 pounds of mail on the load.

Saving Guests From Tips.

From the New York Sun.

The tip has become important enough to be noticed even in private houses. Consequently the expense of country house visiting has been reduced considerably. There are so many servants in large establishments and they came to expect so much that it was necessary to protect the guests. In many country houses, therefore, a small printed card hangs in every guest room. It announces that the servants receive no additional wages on condition that they accept no fees from guests.
